Protestors fight against billionaires

Claremont stands up for workers

Alexander Hernandez
Staff Writer

Roughly 400 protesters gathered at the corner of Foothill and Indian Hill boulevards in Claremont Monday to take part in the nationwide "Workers Over Billionaires" protests.

The day of protest was organized by May Day Strong (https://maydaystrong.org), an organization that seeks to stop the billionaire takeover, with similar organizations to stand up for workers and against the creeping oligarchy.

Protesters braved the heatwave motivated to fight against a government and president they believe does not represent workers.

"Somebody who's in government, especially a president, who is supposed to be defending the Constitution and took an oath to it, is nothing short of a traitor if they're not upholding that," supporter Marge Ruffalo said.

Asked if she had more to add, Ruffalo flipped her cardboard sign, which read "Dump Trump."

Protester Terri Caston held up a sign that read "Good trouble lives on."

"Workers over billionaires," Caston said. "I'm tired of working two jobs... just to make ends meet."

Protesters gathered on Monday at the corner of Foothill Boulevard and Indian Hill Boulevard in Claremont for the "Workers over Billionaires" nationwide protests. The protest was organized by May Day Strong, which seeks to stop billionaires from taking over politics. Protestors held up signs for the cause and various other political issues as cars drove by.

Other signs at Monday's protest read "United Against Tyranny," "Hate Never Made America Great," and "Fight Ignorance, Not Immigrants."

A Donald Trump piñata sat on a stick held by one protestor.

Others were out to advocate for related political causes, including handing out "Yes on Prop 50," the state measure on the Nov. 4 ballot that calls for redistricting California's congressional maps to try to even the playing field following Texas' redistricting move.

Marsha Tudor – representing the organizations Little Pantry, which gathers food and supplies for the homebound, and the Forward Together Hub, which helps those wanting to become more involved – was on hand, collecting donations for Little Pantry. She shared hopeful words.

"There's a lot of good out there," Tudor said. "How can you not be optimistic? Look at all the people out here who care."

Though few representatives of Gen Z showed up, those who did made their voices loud and clear during the Labor Day protest.

Pomona college student Jacques Philippe spoke about the lack of Gen Z representation and urged others to take action.

"You have to truly put your actions, your beliefs into showing that you are supporting, by actually showing up," Philippe said. "Showing up and…not being afraid to join in these types of things.

And do more volunteer and other types of political work, and really support what you believe in."

Kory Wells, also a Pomona College student, who came with Philippe, agreed.

"It's really a privileged take to think that you might be able to escape what's going on right now, or that you don't owe your time to your fellow Americans," Wells said. "At the end of the day, we're all responsible for creating change, and I invite young people to do that."

More than 1,000 similar protests occurred on Labor Day across the country.

Prop 50 would trigger redistricting

Olivia Russo
LV Life Editor

California voters will have a chance to support a mid-cycle redistricting measure in a Nov. 4 special election.

The measure, which would redraw congressional districts in the state and possibly add five more democratic representatives, is designed to counter a recent redistricting move in Texas to potentially add five more republican representatives.

The measure, Proposition 50, spearheaded by Gov. Gavin Newsom, calls for a temporary suspension of the state's independent redistricting commission, which also was approved by voter proposition.

Traditionally redistricting happens every 10 years, coinciding with the U.S. Census to reflect shifts in population.

The Texas measure is designed to add Republican seats to Congress by redrawing congressional maps to eliminate majority minority and reliably Democratic districts in that state is part of an effort by Republicans to hold onto their narrow House majority amid President Trump's dwindling approval ratings among all voters.

"California will not sit idle as Trump and his Republican lapdogs shred our country's democracy before our very eyes," Newsom said in an Aug. 14 press release.

"In just six months, Trump's unchecked power has cost Americans billions and taken an ax to the greatest democracy we've ever known. This moment calls for urgency and action – that is what we are putting before voters this November (as) a chance to fight back against his anti-American ways."

The California measure would temporarily pause the state's redistricting commission for the remainder of the decade, and turn the power to redraw Congressional districts over to the state legislature.

If approved by voters, the measure would call for a redraw of the following Congressional districts:

The first, which covers Redding and most of Yuba County; the third, which covers much of the Sierra Nevada region and Sacramento; the ninth, which covers much of Oakland and parts of the Bay Area; the 13th, which covers parts of Merced County and Fresno; the 22nd, which covers much of the San Joaquin Valley; the 27th, which covers northern Los Angeles County, including parts of the San Fernando Valley; the 41st, which covers most of Coachella Valley and much of Corona; the 45th, which covers parts of Orange and Los Angeles counties; the 47th, which covers western Orange County; and the 48th, which covers parts of San Diego County and the Temecula Valley.

California has 52 representatives in Congress, which currently include 43 Democrats and nine Republicans.

The redistricting plan could flip five seats from Republican to Democrat, which could counter Texas's redistricting plan to flip five Democratic seats to Republican control.

While Texas's redistricting, which did not go to voters, is more-or-less certain, California's is far from a done deal.

"We're not able to predict the turn out well," said Marcia Godwin, associate dean and professor of public administration. "In the 2024 election, Trump got the same amount of votes he got in the election before. But there were 2 million less Democratic votes. The turnout for a presidential election was down, so this (special election) could be people saying they should have voted last time, and they're going to come out in overwhelming numbers."

Newsom has called for Democrats in leadership to go on offense in response to the Trump Administration and Republicans breaking norms and laws to forward their agenda, as Democrats have been reluctant to break norms and fight back.

"People make the analogy of bringing a knife to a gunfight," said Jason Neidleman, professor of political science, said. "You're kind of ceding an advantage to the other side. You allow them to play … 'hardball' when you don't play hardball yourself. You do have to meet that kind of aggressive action with an equally aggressive response."

Newsom emphasized that the California redistricting measure would be a temporary response to the "crisis" created by Texas, and that the state would return to independent redistricting.

"What it means for California is anybody's guess," said Kenneth Marcus, professor of history. "I guess in the best scenario after the 2030 census, the extremely well-meaning … independent commission that was in place in 2008 and 2010 … would go back into place, but we could be in a very different world in 2030."

In the years leading up to the 2030 census, this plan would change the state's political landscape.

People in the same district may not be able to talk to each other because they live so far away, and the minority party in districts could stop participating in politics altogether because the outcome of Congressional elections would be predictable.

The proposed redrawn map can be found on the California State Assembly website.

Bingo takes students back to Y2K

Olivia Russo
LV Life Editor

A competitive race for a free University of La Verne sweatshirt occurred during a game of Mic Drop Bingo.

The Office of Student Engagement and Leadership hosted the event Aug. 29 in the Quay Davis Executive Board Room for about 10 students.

The host would play a snippet of a song from the early 2000s and players would mark their card if they had the song, and the first to get the bingo goal for the round would win one of the prizes.

There were four rounds, each with a different goal.

As a prize they were giving away a free cap or beanie, a sweatshirt and then finally a $10 Spotify gift card.

"I'm feeling really depressed," Brina Valdes-Avolos, freshman communications major, said. "Not literally, but I was waiting for a certain song and I didn't get it. And I'm sad that my whole table got something and not me."

Upon entering and scanning the event pass, students could sit at any of the tables with bingo cards and dotters in the center.

Before the game started, brown bags and an assortment of snacks were at the back counter for students to make their own snack pack.

For the first round, to win a free hat, just one consecutive line of five was required.

The second round had the prize of either a zip-up hoodie or a University of La Verne sweatshirt, for a one diagonal line of five, which was won by Lola Hills, freshman child development and legal studies major.

"As the first winner I feel great because I definitely needed a black zip-up jacket and now I have it and it's really soft," Hills said.

For round three a T-shape going across the top and the middle of a board gave out the first Spotify gift card, Isabella Alonzo, freshman international business and language major, was the winner.

"I'm very proud of myself and I'm going to play bingo tomorrow," Alonzo said. "Tomorrow I won't be winning though."

The last round brought out the competitive spirit in the friend group.

The goal was to get an X-shape, and it took the rest of the event time getting to a winner.

As the round progressed, players were getting restless and would complain when their song did not come up.

Before the next song played, the host walked over to the table to see how close the players were, most of them having their entire board filled up besides just the final spot she needed to complete bingo.

After a few minutes, two of the players needed the same final song to win the game, however, just two songs later Hills marked the last spot on her card and won the final round.

Originally she was going to win the sweatshirt, but she already received the hoodie so she managed to get the second Spotify gift card.

Signifying the end of the game the hosts let anyone take more snacks if they wanted.

The third round winner wanted to trade her gift card in for the sweatshirt, and gifted it to one of the other players who were competing in the final round.

"As long as I came out winning something and as long as [Valdes-Avolos] didn't win anything is all that really matters," Robert Saxton, freshman math and business major, said.

Dinner Crawl provides good times

Restaurants offer free meals

Donya Rouzbehi
Staff Writer

The Office of Student Engagement and Leadership hosted its annual Dinner Crawl on Aug. 28 in Mainiero Square.

Students entered with their event pass and received a free meal from a participating restaurant of their choice on D Street.

Among participating restaurants were Argo Mediterranean Grille, Mi Cocina and Cafe Wang.

The Dinner Crawl was popular among the student body. With busy schedules and tight budgets, college students could not resist free food. About 150 students in all participated.

Every year, the organizers bring in a DJ blasting trendy music and beats to get the event going.

"Along with the free food, I like the music too," Jazmine Arzaga, junior computer science major, said.

Aidyn Hosier, junior international business and language major, appreciated the convenience of enjoying a good meal while saving money.

"It's my second time coming to the Dinner Crawl and I'll definitely be back. But I feel like a lot of people didn't know about it actually, our friends told us," Hosier said.

Hosier and Arzaga both agreed that they'd prefer more publicity and promotion surrounding this event.

Organizers loved seeing students come together for a meal and sit together while supporting the local community.

Jaleena Rodriguez is a junior majoring in psychology at the University and served as SOAR orientation leader last year. This year she had the honor to be one of the coordinators of the event.

"The best part is seeing new students come together with returning students and sit together and have a meal," Rodriguez said. "And D Street is such a monumental thing on campus, so students getting to explore it and try different food for free is really good."

Along with Rodriguez, Hailey Battista, sophomore elementary education major, finds it interesting how much this event unites the student body on campus.

"This is my first year coordinating. It's really interesting seeing how everyone comes together even if it's only for a couple hours," Battista said. "I feel like a lot of people don't know what's inside D Street, so this gives them the opportunity to go and explore it."

The Office of Student Engagement and Leadership have been hosting dinner crawls for a few years now.

Their goal is to gain exposure for D Street vendors and businesses in the community.

Director of Student Engagement and Leadership Cindy Vallejo-Victoria enjoys seeing new and returning students explore the city of La Verne, outside of the campus.

"Most recently, we have shifted this event to being inclusive to not just new students but our returning students as well," Vallejo-Victoria said. "This is our third year hosting the event and my favorite part is seeing students getting excited and visiting the different restaurants. Some may not be within their budget, but with the free meal tickets, they get to try."

Vallejo-Victoria enjoyed getting to know the business owners on D Street. She also had the pleasure of attending an Old Town La Verne business meeting.

Makerspace sparks inner creativity

Cassidy Diaz

The Wilson Library hosted its first Makerspace event for the fall semester on Aug 28, in the Makerspace room to inspire creativity and relieve stress as the semester begins.

The event had various crafts for students to take part in, such as creating personalized buttons, making stickers and painting on canvases.

The space also offered 3D printing and crocheting.

As soft music played in the background, students quietly worked on their own creative projects.

Sierra Brown, junior psychology major and crochet club member, said she spends most of her time in the Makerspace.

"You can just go, and it's meant to be a creative space and just a place where you can relax and do any kind of thing that you want," Brown said.

The Makerspace hosts craft days at the beginning and end of every semester.

"(It's) just a way to have a relaxing time before the semester gets hectic and have another relaxing time when all the hecticness and busyness is finished," said Madison Calleros, a Makerspace technician.

"Even though someone may not be creatively talented, it is still a really good way to calm your mind and relax," Calleros said.

Students at last week's event were most drawn to button-making. With hand drawn illustrations, they could make several small art pieces.

"I hope students take interest in the Makerspace," Calleros said. "And they choose to come back for more workshops and events," Calleros said.

"I was keeping an eye out on when they would have an event," said Monique Hernandez, a freshman psychology major who attended last week's event.

"I've been really stressed lately with coming into college, so it's nice to get my mind off of it," Hernandez said. "I can go back to my homework with a fresh mind and I feel like it's just nice to create something."

"Whether you're creative or not… people would definitely benefit from Makerspace," Freshman Abigail Pastrana said.

The Makerspace is open from 11 a.m. to 6 p.m. Monday through Friday.

Soccer comes out short in draw

Team still searches for first goal

Miguel Navarro
Staff Writer

The Leopards saw a lot of improvement in their non-conference game of the season, however they were unable to score a goal in the 0-0 draw against George Fox on Monday at Ortmayer Stadium.

The La Verne Leopards are coming off a hard-fought 2-0 loss against Cal State San Bernardino on Friday. The pressure for the Leopards to get their first goal of the season was on.

Early in the game, the Leopards did not wait around and had a clear approach. They played aggressively throughout the game. They outshot the Bruins, 12-3.

"A lot of what we've been working on has been the defensive transition from winning it to what we do with it next," head coach Lauryn Pehanich said. "I thought we had a lot of possession of the ball and were able to move the ball properly."

Due to the Leopards' ability to maintain the time of possession, they were able to create plenty of scoring opportunities.

Finally, in the 12th minute, the Leopards created their first shot by junior midfielder Kailey Kolesar. She led the team with four shots on target.

"I was really just looking to take advantage of the opportunities I was given," Kolesar said.

As the game progressed, the Leopards created a couple of close opportunities to score early in the game. In the 24th minute, both sophomore midfielder Lex Sahagian and Kolesar were unable to finish their shot attempts.

With the Leopards' attack continuing to create chances, their defense continued to shine and limit any chances from the Bruins.

The time of possession was dominated by the Leopards as they headed into halftime.

Fresh off the break, the Bruins came out with an aggressive attack of their own.

However, any opportunity to take the lead was quickly stopped by the freshman goalkeeper Katy Beck. She is coming off a great nine-save performance that she continued to build on in a big way.

"I would say what has been working so well is the encouragement from my teammates and knowing I have to show up for them," Beck said. "Also being there for my team and doing what I can do."

Quickly, the momentum of the game was back in favor of the Leopards as they continued to apply pressure on the Bruins' defense.

Halfway through the second half, the urgency for La Verne rose as the game remained tied.

As the time wound down, the Leopards failed to execute a few opportunities to take the advantage.

The opportunities mounted with eight shots were attempted in the second half, but none found the back of the net.

"There are too many times that our attacking line has possession of the ball and has an opportunity to either take a one-versus-one or create a two-versus-one situation, and it is not quite in their mind to go out and do it themselves," Pehanich said.

As the closing minutes of the game arrived, the Leopards continued to show their effort but were unable to come away with the much-needed goal.

Despite not seeing the results they wanted, there were still positives to take from the game.

"If we keep just working hard, then I feel like we will get our chances and eventually score a goal," sophomore midfielder Khalea Turingan said.

With this draw, the Leopards' record is now 0-1-1 in season play.

Their next matchup will be at 10 a.m. Saturday in Santa Clarita against The Master's University.

Volleyball triumphs in tournament

Rubbie Chavez
Staff Writer

The La Verne women's volleyball team opened their season with a three game winning sweep at the annual Pacific Coast Classic at Frantz Athletic Court over the weekend. The Leopards battled in this two-day tournament with an idea of what their season might look like for the year.

The Leopards started the tournament with returning players as well as new ones ready to make an impact for this season. The Pacific Coast Classic is a series of Division III tournaments that brings together different ranked schools to play against each other for a weekend.

For head coach Jeff Hendershot it was a great way to see the new and returning players work together.

"I'm really happy about our performance," said Hendershot. "We're still figuring it out but we played our best. It was a really good opening weekend for us, so I'm proud of us."

The Leopards started off the tournament Aug. 29 with a close game against St. Olaf.

Big plays from sophomore middle blocker Mya Ray and junior outside hitter Lauren Gott helped the Leopards fight throughout the game.

La Verne put up a fight in the fifth set, closing out the game despite a rocky start.

"We've been working on some things offensively that we didn't quite get to this weekend, but there is plenty of room for improvement and for us to keep going," said Hendershot.

Ray finished the tournament with 43 kills.

"Our highlight this weekend was against St. Olaf because we were struggling a little but we kept pushing and finished strong," Ray said.

The second game on Aug. 29 against Buffalo State really set the tone for the rest of the weekend for La Verne. The Leopards took immediate action in showing their performance and what they can do when they click as a team.

Junior middle blocker Zacky Coaston and junior opposite Alanna Jones had a great impact for helping out the team in adding kills to their stats. The Leopards beat Buffalo State in a three-set sweep.

In the third match on Saturday afternoon, the Leopards looked to end the tournament strong.

The Leopards faced Case Western Reserve where they finished in another three-set sweep, led by Ray and Coaston.

"We did really well this weekend," Coaston said. "It was kind of hard to figure out since we have a bunch of new girls but at the end of the weekend we figured it out and really connected."

Coaston had 22 kills.

"I thought this was a really good opening weekend for us," junior setter Malia Capistrano said. "We came out and won all three games, which is good. We want to work on our mistakes we had this weekend which will help us for next weekend."

Capistrano finished with 53 assists and 17 digs.

"Our defense and our blocking was really good this weekend," said Hendershot. "We're a fun energetic group and I'm really excited about that."

The Leopards next matchups will be against Whitworth for the Whittier Invitational at 6 p.m. Friday at Frantz Athletic Court.
